

Something to talk about: experts say better hearing means better relationships.

The best relationships are built on good communication. Imagine then, if you can no longer hear what someone is saying across the dinner table or in a meeting. When communication breaks down, it's common to feel frustrated, misunderstood and even ignored. At the same time your family, friends, and coworkers can feel misunderstood, too. And resentment can build up if they have to continually repeat themselves or shout to be heard. It's no wonder, then, that hearing loss can and will cause relationship problems.

People with untreated hearing loss often are not aware of all its potential side effects. The enormous effort required to communicate - and the inability to communicate effectively - can lead to:

- Fatigue
- Irritability
- Negativism
- Depression
- Loneliness
- Avoidance or withdrawal from social situations
- Anger
- Tension
- Stress
- Social rejection

The important thing to know is that these problems can be prevented and resolved with hearing aids. With today's advanced and aesthetic hearing solutions, there's no reason to live with hearing loss. Ease the strain on your relationships by scheduling a hearing evaluation today.

Consumer Reports recommends obtaining hearing aids from an Ear, Nose, and Throat physician. ENTs are more thorough in their evaluation, and can rule out many conditions which may affect your hearing.

"Consultation with specially trained professionals who work as a team is important for the evaluation of a hearing loss and selection of appropriate management. An otolaryngologist (ENT) should evaluate the individual with a hearing problem to make the diagnosis and exclude related systemic disorders that may contribute to the problem."

"The Food and Drug Administration has determined that my best health interest would be served if I had a medical evaluation by a licensed physician (preferably a physician who specializes in diseases of the ear) before purchasing a hearing aid."
